RE: Agenda Item G.1 Pacific sardine rebuilding plan

Dear Mr. Anderson and Council members:

We write to urge your adoption of a science-based plan that effectively recovers Pacific sardines — one of the ocean's most important fish species. Pacific sardines are overfished and the task before you is clear. Rebuilding this critical fish population will benefit recreational and commercial fisheries and coastal economies, provide food for much larger ocean animals — like whales, sea lions and salmon — and improve the health of the ocean ecosystem. This is why we support Oceana's recommended alternative: limit the annual sardine catch to no more than five percent of the estimated population size until they rebuild to healthy levels. We also request stronger conservation and management measures to limit the amount of sardines incidentally caught as bycatch in other commercial fisheries targeting other species.

Last year, the National Marine Fisheries Service officially declared this population "overfished," triggering a clear legal mandate for fishery managers to develop a rebuilding plan. Rebuilding plans must ensure that overfished populations are rebuilt to sustainable levels in as short a time as possible, not to exceed 10 years, with limited exceptions. Our nation has made remarkable strides toward restoring overfished populations to healthy, sustainable levels by following the mandates and guidelines of our nation's fishery law — the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act. If done right, we can expect the same for Pacific sardines.

The Pacific sardine population off the U.S. Pacific coast of California, Oregon and Washington has collapsed 98 percent since 2006. In 2015, this population fell below a critical "cutoff" threshold and the directed commercial fishery has since been closed. Fishing pressure continues as sardines are caught as bycatch in other commercial fisheries and are targeted and sold under an exempted fishing permit and as bait for recreational fisheries.

Forage fish — like sardines and anchovies — are the heartbeat of a healthy ocean ecosystem. They provide a critical food source for whales, dolphins, sea lions, seabirds, and fish like tuna and salmon. Yet during the recent sardine collapse, in combination with low anchovy abundance, ocean wildlife like brown pelicans and California sea lions suffered unprecedented reproductive failures.

Also during the collapse, U.S. and international commercial fishing pressure was high. Sustainable fishing rates were exceeded for at least five straight years. While forage fish can exhibit large natural fluctuations in abundance, science shows excessive fishing pressure can make their collapses more severe.

Now is the time to let the Pacific sardine population heal, and to fix the management that exacerbated this crash. Allowable catch levels must be reduced and the well-documented and fundamental errors in science and management that contributed to the current sardine collapse must be addressed. Please take this time to improve sardine fishery management so that when these fish recover, catch levels and biological limits are appropriately set.

Importantly, please support Oceana's recommended rebuilding alternative and act responsibly and decisively for the betterment of fisheries, communities and the spectacular ocean wildlife that call these waters home.

Sincerely,
The undersigned 15,717 residents of the United States
